Arab West Report (AWR) makes a solid contribution to deeper understanding of inter-confessional dynamics in Egypt and elsewhere by seeking to give context to day-to-day discourses and events that often appear senseless or even capricious to the uninformed observer. The AWR's analysis not only serves to increase understanding and trust among those with interest in Egypt itself but also provides a fine example of how to wrestle with communal frictions more generally. For this reason, the AWR is of inestimable value as an academic resource, and I include content from the AWR in my teaching to help students gain deeper appreciation for the diverse factors that influence inter-religious and inter-cultural relations in our day.
